In Exchange, the Sender Policy Framework (SPF) is a feature of the Sender ID extension in Microsoft Exchange 2013 that defines the SPF to be used to match the "From:" header of a message with a specific sender. Sender Policy Framework (SPF) The Sender Policy Framework (SPF) can be used to identify the domain that a message is sent from. The SPF records used by the SPF are stored in a database called the DNS Resource Records Database (RRD) that is used to store the records needed for SPF verification. The Sender Policy Framework (SPF) feature of Exchange 2013 maps a domain to either an IP address, an email address, or both, depending on the value of the domain. An SPF record contains an IPv4 or IPv6 address for a domain, the name of an IP address in that domain, the SPF record type, a label that must match the "From:" header of the message being verified, and a set of additional information. SPF records are stored in the DNS RRD, where they can be searched for using the Net::DNS library. The SPF records can be used to match email messages sent from a domain to the recipient in the "From:" header, and to record the sender as a sender that the recipient can trust. There are a number of ways to use the SPF records: An SPF record for an email address can identify a sender as either an authenticated or unauthenticated sender. The SPF record type for an email address can be one of three types: none, p, or v. The none and p types are not used. The v type indicates that the sender is authenticated and that the mail will be delivered to the recipient. The v type is used for the example in this document. The SPF label is optional. The default label is the "From:" header value. The additional SPF record information can be one of several types: host mismatch permit refused tempfail zoneset mx update spf _dmarc spfapprox spf1 This article shows how to enable and use the SPF feature of Exchange 2013 to identify a sender
