This is a program which allows you to create macros. In other words, you can set a key combination which performs an action or does something based on a condition. Such as switching between dark and light modes. The following are some of the features that make

KEYMACRO stand out from the crowd. Overcoming the traditional problem of which key combinations are bound to what actions, KEYMACRO offers you a full keyboard map of the Win32 API. This means that you can assign the KEY_LEFT, KEY_UP, KEY_DOWN, and KEY_HOME to do things on the screen, and these actions are fully customizable. The keyboard map is created based on the combinations of keys that you've set in the configuration file, but you can also manually define your own keyboard actions. The program provides a convenient interface for doing all of these actions. This is because the keyboard map can be displayed at any time. Another feature is that you can group your macros into packages. These packages can then be assigned to a button in the GUI. So, you can have a single macro called, say, MODE, that can be used to switch between dark and light modes, or any other of your own macro packages. The program also has the ability to assign a number to each macro and to remember this number when you close the program. This allows you to restore macros later without having to go through the configuration file. Finally, the program allows you to directly set up keyboard actions on the fly. This allows you to make individual actions, for example, “Shift Home”. So, you don’t need to go through the menu when you want to use a special macro.

KEYMACRO is a very simple and well-designed program. And with its friendly and self-explanatory interface, you should be able to use it without any trouble.
